How to Have a Good Rinner ng, and it will always continue to be a ubject of the first interest, for most men are more interested about their dinner than their libraries. Money is spent more willingly for dinner than for anything lse, and there is little besitation about dding unnecessary luxuries to it, dainties that are eaten for most part with little appetite, the cost of which would, in a little time, furnish a house with books, pictures, flowers, and works of beauty, which would be a constant least to the yes. Most people, however, cat only with

There is comething almost comical about the serious devotion to eating, the anxiety or which is it the cause in so many houseiolds, the time it consumes, the importance attached to it. What an immerse amount of work men do for their dinner; for it atty much all comes to that. If it were ot for the dinner, what leisure the housewife would have; what ton the most the least affected by the beaten substant would be spared, whose money is so fast the least affected by the beaten substant the had been handling. Well, eating must be admitted to be a necessary pleasure. The man who does not. joy his dinner is an ingrate, no more to peltrusted than the man who has no ear for nusic, and cannot be touched by a fine andecape or painting of the same. But a dinner depends so much upon the appetite one brings to it, that it is a great wonder men do not pay more attention to that. There is no expense they will undergo to get a tempting dinner. They will send to land's end for game, to water's end for fish; they will rake the sea and search the air for delecasies. They will summon science and epicurean invention to find out new temptations for the palate. A fine dinner is the result of high civilization. so much on his dinner, as a rule, does not get what he is after.
